CAREER OPPORTUNITIES IN CORPORATE SOCIAL RESPONSIBILITY

Description of the Field
“Corporate Social Responsibility” is an evolving and maturing field. It emerged in the 1990s as the new big idea in the business world and since then has developed into a field with substantial and diverse career opportunities. The term “corporate social responsibility” (CSR) has been coined to define how companies behave in social, environmental, and ethical contexts. CSR involves integrating the issues of the workplace, the community, and the marketplace into core business strategies. A recent development is the concept of “creating shared value,” which more deeply incorporates CSR into corporate policies and operating practices to enhance competitiveness while simultaneously advancing the economic and social conditions in the communities in which it operates. Driving this emerging field are the customers who choose products with good reputation, investors who put money into companies with exemplary records, firms that invest in the future or training of their employees, and employers interested in mutually beneficial relationships with local communities.

Career opportunities in CSR reflect the diversity of the field and incorporate the private, public, and nonprofit sectors.

Private Sector
The first place to find CSR-related positions is within companies. CSR departments are often located in places such as the public affairs/relations, compliance, or legal divisions and known alternatively as “human rights programs,” “reputation management,” or “environmental risk.” Opportunities are also appearing in the large accounting and consulting firms, many of which are trying to compete with the niche CSR consulting firms and offering their own CSR client services. The growth of interest in socially responsible investing (SRI) has also led to opportunities working for companies which screen firms on CSR issues and produce stock indices and socially-conscious mutual funds. As with strategic CSR consultancies, SRI jobs can be found either within larger investment houses or in independent boutique firms. Strategic CSR consulting firms provide an opportunity to work with public, private and nonprofit sectors on a range of issues. Firms often concentrate on specific areas including strategy, management, environment, rating and foundations.

Public Sector
The public sector CSR career options can be found mainly in national government agencies and international organizations. There are now CSR positions in international organizations such as the UN’s International Labor Organization and the World Bank via the Business Partners for Development program. National governments have also started building CSR departments, often in their international development branches such as USAID in the US and the DFID and Foreign Office in the UK. The British government has even gone as far as instituting a Minister for Corporate Social Responsibility. Internationally, both the UN and the World Bank have become very involved in promoting CSR. Through the UN there is the International Labor Organization, the Global Compact, and some initiatives within the UNDP. Both the World Bank and World Bank Institute have their own initiatives in CSR, corporate governance, and private sector development. Like nonprofits, many UN organizations have a fundraising/partnership office for the purpose of building partnerships with the private sector.
Nonprofit Sector
There are a wide variety of NGOs, industry associations, think tanks, and academic institutions engaging in learning and/or advocacy within the CSR arena. These include groups such as the Business for Social Responsibility, Climate Counts, and Ceres. These groups promote and examine the use of CSR concepts within the private and public spheres. NGOs and nonprofits often have positions related to corporate partnership development for programs. While these roles are primarily focused on fundraising, they may also include program development components.

Career Paths and Entry Salaries
Career opportunities in CSR reflect the diversity of the field and incorporate the private, public, and nonprofit sectors. Skills and knowledge required in this field may include an appreciation and understanding of societal needs, a greater understanding of the true bases of company productivity, and the ability to collaborate across for-profit/nonprofit boundaries. Opportunities tend to overlap with the sustainability and environmental management fields.

Career paths vary and can begin in big business, working in the compliance department of a firm such as Levi Strauss, but eventually move into the public sector, designing government policy and go into a niche consulting company providing CSR client services.

Entry salaries vary as much as career paths and could range from the lower end of working for a CSR nonprofit to better remunerated positions working in the legal department of a corporation. Between these extremes are corporate positions and those within international institutions such as the World Bank and the UN.

Demand
Consumers are demanding more information on everything from where and how their goods are produced to the environmental record of the companies they invest in. Both the Dow Jones and FTSE produce specialist indices to provide investors with information on which companies score highly on CSR-related concerns. The governments of some countries require companies to assess and monitor their wider social, environmental, and ethical performances. There is some debate, however, among CSR experts on the extent of customers’ CSR demands, both in socially responsible niche markets and in mainstream markets.

The large natural resource extraction companies such as Shell, BP, and ExxonMobil were the earliest to address CSR issues and hire CSR professionals. This was in part due to the particular nature of their products. In the 1980s, footwear and apparel companies were forced to address the problem of sweatshops in their supply chains. Nike, in particular, was called out for its poor working conditions in developing countries and has now turned that crisis around through their CSR efforts and is ranked as one of the best examples of a corporate citizen. The spotlight is widening: companies as diverse as Hershey’s and Hewlett Packard are looking very carefully at their wider responsibilities, as they see the business benefits of CSR over adverse publicity. Job opportunities in CSR have expanded as a result. In addition, there are companies, such as Timberland, Ben and Jerry’s, and Stonyfield Farms, which have put CSR performance at the center of their brand image.

Following the growth in interest of CSR among these companies, the large consulting and accounting firms are now offering their own CSR-related services. These include Arthur D. Little’s environment and risk services, Ernst and Young’s environmental and sustainability services, KPMG’s sustainability and advisory services and social auditing services, and PwC’s reputation assurance practice. Even the large development consulting companies such as Development Alternatives Incorporated (DAI), whose clients are usually government agencies, are getting involved due to the considerable impact so many MNCs have on developing world communities.

The demand for people with an interest or experience in the CSR field is growing quickly as communications improve and demand for increased transparency and accountability in the corporate sector increases. In addition, recognition of the important positive role that the corporate sector can play in the communities it touches has encouraged companies themselves to become involved, spurred on by governments and nonprofit organizations.

It should also be noted that the commitment to CSR and hence supply of related jobs is, at present, more developed in Europe than it is in the US, although the American market is growing rapidly.

Qualifications Necessary to Enter the Field

There are no prerequisite qualifications to enter this field. Since the field itself is relatively new, direct experience in the sector is less important than it might be in other professions. Rather, transferable skills and knowledge are valued instead. For example, a law degree might be necessary for certain human rights positions, or a scientific degree or background required to work in environmental CSR. Many corporations move staff into CSR positions as a staff retention strategy. This makes joining a corporate CSR office more challenging but not impossible.

In addition to content knowledge, it is important to demonstrate a long-term interest in the subject and to be conversant on the current CSR debates. Interest can be shown through extra-curricular involvement in CSR societies and conferences (such as Net Impact), coursework, internships, or a variety of other activities. The CSR community is still relatively small; therefore, it can be much easier to network and become familiar with current issues than in more established fields.

Future Challenges of the Profession
Along with the increasing interest in and development of the field of CSR, there are some challenges as well. Like every emerging field, some people have tried to downplay its importance and labeled it a trend which may go out of fashion. There is certainly a backlash in some quarters: Nestlé withdrew some of its commitments and Nike has fought to defend some statements it made back in 1996 about its working conditions. And like Human Resources and Marketing departments, during an economic downturn, honoring CSR commitments are more difficult for some firms. In addition, there is also much work to be done to make the CSR field itself more rigorous, to find ways to gather qualitative and quantitative information more efficiently and easily, and to make standards more uniform and accepted in specific sectors. Despite these challenges, the CSR movement has gained enough momentum such that it would be hard to reverse; therefore, people with CSR-related skills and experience are therefore likely to be increasingly sought after.
